HOW IT WAS DONE

The News is still disgusted with the State administration for having saved a money panic in Nevada.

It sums up the work as follows:
 Inspired by the banking interests, prepared by an Attorney, presented for signature by a messenger, signed by an absent Lieutenant Acting Governor, attested by an absent Secretary of State, sealed by the Deputy Secretary of State, announced and proclaimed before it reached the State house.

Now the Appeal, for the sake of argument is willing to admit that the above is a true history of the document which gave the State a weeks legal holiday.

The document was inspired by the banking interests. The banks of Nevada do most of their business through San Francisco banks. Their money is mostly deposited there to meet these drafts.

The unforeseen calamity which came like a thunderbolt from a blue sky put every bank in Nevada where it could not immediately realize on the money and securities in the vaults in San Francisco.

A check on a San Francisco bank would not be worth the paper it was written on. Hence if depositors came and would not accept checks and wanted their money it might have closed a bank and the closing of the smallest bank in this State would have precipitated a run on the rest and most of them would have gone down like a house of cards. This panic would have spread to every business house in the state and when these various institutions had gone into bankruptcy and the banks into the hands of the receivers the depositors would have come out with sixty cents on the dollar.

The banking interests saw at a glance that one weeks breathing spell would save this calamity and they applied to the State Government for the protection which they, as the heaviest tax-payers of the State had a right to ask.

A State official went down on the night train to meet Acting Governor Allen at Reno and have the document signed there. It was Monday morning when the signature was affixed to the proclamation and it was not done at the Capitol because if Allen had gone up on the train that morning and arrived at somewhere between ten and twelve o'clock, as the train might happen to arrive, it would have been too late to have done any good, as the run on the Reno banks would have already begun, the panic started and under full head way.

The proclamation was accordingly posted in Reno early in the morning and when the business men of Reno saw it there was a sigh of relief and an inward "thank God," from hundreds.

The original document then came up on the train and was attested in the Secretary of State's office by the Deputy. It was informal but when Gilbert Deans, the principle, arrived he commended his deputy on his prompt action and disregard of red tape in the emergency.

Now that he will not side with the News and try to "do politics" in the face of the threat on the public streets that they will send a number of State officials to the Penitentiary for their participation in this war he continues to be criticised.

John Dowdle, aged 28 years, died at Tonopah last Monday. He was formerly of Payson, Utah.
